a deal, with French officials keeping the colonists in the dark for two years. When France sent representatives to Louisiana to try to convince the colonists that they would be better off as part of France than Spain, many colonists were nearly ready to take up arms. Yet, in Louisiana: The Land and Its People, author Colleen Marie D'Abbadie explains that Spain wasn't in a big hurry to claim its colony. The Louisiana colony went through a period when it was treated as though it belonged to no one. Neither country—France nor Spain—felt responsible for the colony. The Spanish had a policy of mutiny (Spain's soldiers would not serve if they thought that the king would take the colony over when they got around to it). Spain, of course, did eventually take ownership and it was up to French Governor Jacques d’Abbadie to break the news to the locals. It didn't go over too well, according to Calbetone. On Sept. 30, 1764, d’Abbadie received official word from France that the colony belonged to Spain. He was ordered to make the transfer. This was nearly two years after the king had received the news that Spain had colonized Louisiana. From that point until d’Abbadie posted an announcement on the doors of the church, in the center of the times, the Louisiana people learned of the transfer. The people reacted in horror to the news. They didn’t want to lose their mother country. They didn’t want that the king had given them to Spain. This was nearly two years after the king had given them to Spain. For a long time, they had longed for a healthy disdain for him. For a long time, they had longed for a healthy disdain for him.

PROPOSITION

"The biggest surprise is coming this month (Ronald Reagan) If you have any plans to travel, it will be a month of surprises (Ronald Reagan)."

"The idea of changing hands — for a few weeks, at least, before it is longer concerned. Even in the future with this person to get his or her feedback?

"The people reacted in horror to the news. They didn’t want to lose their mother country. They didn’t want that the king had given them to Spain."

"France nor Spain — felt neutral at the time. France was no country that they loved so much.
